ABSTRACT. - A checklist of published records of the barnacles (Cirripedia: Thoracica) of the South China Sea is presented, with 315 species belonging to 76 genera and 21 families recorded. The South China Sea cirripede fauna is tropical and subtropical in nature. A small group of species exhibits cosmopolitan distributions but the majority of species are either widely distributed in the Indo-West Pacific faunal province or in the Indo-Australian sub-faunal province. A small group of species have western Pacific affinities. Another small group of species is restricted to the South China Sea, and there is also an endemic element of the Sino-Japanese region.

KEY WORDS. - Barnacles, Cirripedia, South China Sea

INTRODUCTION

The systematic arrangement used here reflects inferred phylogenetic relationships within the Cirripedia (Thoracica). The sequence is based mainly upon that given by Newman (1996) and also accommodates a more recent generic revision of the Verrucidae (Young, 1998). Genera and species are arranged alphabetically within each family. Each species is entered under the current binomen. This is followed by the author's name, date of publication and page number. The original combination and known synonyms are also listed. Geographic distributions are recorded by general areas, noted from west to east and south to north, with localities in the South China Sea additionally specified where possible. Where uncertainty regarding some species records exist, these are recorded with a query and a note. Bathymetric ranges, substrate types and hosts are noted where possible. More extensive information concerning hosts is essential to understanding the habitat and the geographic range of epizoic species as well as the microhabitats they occupy on their hosts. A reference number refers to the Literature Cited list at the end of the paper. The latter comprises taxonomic papers, which provide species descriptions, diagnostic drawings, anatomical and whole specimen descriptions, taxonomic keys and the names of repositories where specimens are held; general geographical distributional literature; and some taxonomy-related ecological and biological papers.

Biogeography. - The cirripedian fauna of the South China Sea is tropical and subtropical in nature. Some species are typically tropical (eg Lithotrya valentiana, Octolasmis grayi, Creusia spinulosa, Savignium crenatum), with many associated with either coral reefs or occurring epizoically on marine vertebrates and invertebrates.

The majority of South China Sea barnacle species are either widely distributed in the Indo-west Pacific faunal province, or in the Indo-Australian sub-province of the Indo-west Pacific region (ie the area defined by the Indo-Malayan Archipelago, Australia and New Guinea, to Japan). Indo-west Pacific species may be recorded from east African shores through to the Pacific Ocean, as well as from Australia, through the South China Sea to Japan (eg Ibla cumingi, Altiverruca crystallina, Chthamalus malayensis). Examples of Indo-Australian species are Calantica trispinosa, Rostratorverruca kruegeri and Euacasta dofleini.

A group of species found in the South China Sea has a cosmopolitan distribution (eg Lepas (Anatifia) pectinata, Conchoderma virgatum, Platylepas hexastylos), some of which are well known fouling species (eg Balanus amphitrite, Balanus trigonus, Megabalanus tintinnabulum). A small group of species is restricted to the South China Sea (eg Paralepas robusta, Scalpellum typicum, Pachylasma chinense, Conopea canaliculatus). There is also an endemic element of the Sino-Japanese region, which includes some warm-water species occurring in the East and the South China Seas and in waters of southern Japan (eg Heteralepas smilius, Koleolepas avis, Conopea granulata, Neoacasta coriobasis), as well as a small group of species which have western Pacific affinities (eg Temnaspis kilepoae, Octolasmis hawaiiense, Solidobalanus (Solidobalanus) hawaiiensis).

Dong et al. (1980), in a study of the Cirripedia of the China Sea, listed 80 species belonging to 29 genera in 13 families, 71 of which were recorded from the South China Sea. The checklist presented herein records 316 species belonging to 76 genera in 21 families.
